We are informed that much feeling exists in town respecting an attempt by John R. Adams, Esq to remove the Irish by force from their present settlement. Should they be removed immediately, many of them must come upon the town. Many of them must suffer by cold; and for the want of comfortable habitations, which it will be impossible for them to procure before next Spring. It may be, for aught we know, legally right to force them from their cabins to endure the cold, and face the storms of the coming winter, without money, and without the power to procure a shelter from the northern blast, but there is neither natural right nor humanity in the business. Should they be driven out, it will prove an expense, probably of several thousand dollars, to the town, between this time and next May.
